#ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE

Bring Your Photos to Life

Art with These Free AI Tools

Ghibli's enchanting animation style has captiaudiences worldwide, inspiresque artworks using AI-powered tools. These platforms offer user-friendly interfaces and impressive results, often at no cost. Here are some notable free AI image editors that can help you create Developed by xAI, Grok allows users to upload photos and apply the Ghibli art style. By providing detailed prompts, users can generate images that closely resemble Studio Ghibli's aesthetic. To enhance results, combining Grok with ChatGPT for prompt generation is recommended Fotor offers a free platform to transform images into Ghiblistyle artwork. It provides multiple style options, including 'Ghibli Style,' allowing users to upload an image, select the desired style, and download the Ghibli-inspired result.

Getimg.ai is a versatile AI tool supporting Studio Ghibli-style image generation. It offers both text-to-image and image-to image features, allowing users to describe scenes or upload images for transformation into Ghibli-inspired artwork.

insMind insMind specializes in converting photos into Studio Ghiblistyle artwork through its free AI filter. It captures the essence of Ghibli's aesthetic, producing visuals with rich colours and soft textures. Users can upload images and apply the filter to create anime-inspired portraits or scenes.

AI Ease

AI Ease offers a free Ghibli AI filter that converts photos into captivating Ghibli art in seconds. Users can upload their images and apply the Ghibli style with ease, creating personalzed artwork reminiscent of Japanese animations.

Considerations

- Quality Consistency: While these tools are free, the quality and consistency of the generated images may vary. Experimenting with different platforms can help you find the one that
- est suits vour needs. • Privacy: Uploading personal photos to online platforms raises privacy concerns. It's advisable to review the privacy poli-
- before use Usage Rights: Be mindful of the usage rights associated with AI-generated images, especially if you plan to use them for commercial purposes.
- By exploring these free AI image editors, vou can immerse yourself in the whimsical world of Studio Ghibli, creating personalized artworks that capture the magic of the beloved animacies of these services tion style.

Tatia Tope's soldiers from The Illustrated London News, 1858 and a depiction violence, perpetrated by the Indians and the Britons, on an unprecedented scale. 'Never before and never after in the history of British rule in of rebel leader Nana Sahib on an elephant.

India was there violence at the level that Rudrangshu Mukherjee revisits a chapter of history that is often ignored. Anniversaries are important in India. Thus, it will surprise nobody if any anniversary of the revolt of 1857 is celebrated with some fanfare. Speeches will be made extolling the revolt as the First War of Indian Independence, as Vinavak Damodar Savarkar called it. Such celebrations invariably have a propensity to underplay a very inte-Violence. The summer of 1857 saw violence, perpetrated by the Indians and the Britons, on an unprecedented scale. Never before and never after in the history of British rule in India was there violence at the level that 1857 witnessed. It began with violence in the late afternoon of May 10 in Meerut, with the sepovs destroying government buildings, the jail, record room, kachehri, telegraph office, and going on to destroy the bungalows in which the firangi lived. The peasants of the surrounding villages participated in the destruction. What accompanied the destruction was the killing of the White population of Meerut, irrespective of gender and age. Once the mayhem was over and dusk had fallen, a group of sepoys rode off towards Delhi where they arrived in the morning of May 11. It was the month of Ramadan and the old and powerless Mughal Emperor, Bahadur Shah, heard a clamour outside his window in the Lal Qilla. The sepovs from Meerut were the source of the commotion. They declared to their Badshah that they had killed the firangi and had declared war on them in Meerut. They had come to him to make him

Another group of sepoys had already entered Delhi and there, together with the sepoys stationed in Delhi, they destroyed and killed, their targets being government property and the White people. A handful of Britons escaped to take refuge in Metcalfe House. Ghalib who saw the scenes of destruction noted thus in his diary, "Throughout the day, the rebels looted the city, and at night, they slept in silken beds. The city of Delhi was emptied of its rulers and peopled instead by creatures of the Lord who accepted no lord."

By May 12, Delhi was outside British control and Bahadur Shah had been forced by the sepoys to become the leader of the rebellion. As the news of the fall of Delhi travelled down the Ganges valley, canafter cantonment Blowing Mutinous Sepoys From the Guns, September 8th, 1857, a steel engraving from London Printing and Publishing Co, 1858.

British measures to put an end to this rebellion were not slow in coming. And these measures displayed unparalleled ferocity and vengeance. By the beginning of June 1857, the Delhi, Meerut, Rohilkhand, Agra, Allahabad and Benares divisions had been placed under martial law. By a series of Acts passed in May and June, the definition of martial law was enlarged. These various Acts gave Britons the power to judge and take the life of Indians without recourse to the due process of law. All restrictions on the use of power were removed.

mutinied till, by the beginning of June, British rule in North India, save in Punjab and Bengal, had disappeared. It had 'collapsed,' in the words of one British officer, 'like a house made of cards.' In every cantonment, the mutinies followed the pattern set in Meerut. The sepoys destroyed government property and killed. They were joined in this violence by the villagers of the surrounding area. The sepoys, who were all of rural origin and were therefore peasants in uniform, once they had mutinied, shed their uniforms and easily merged with the

An emeute in the army thus quickly acquired the character of a opular uprising by moving beyond

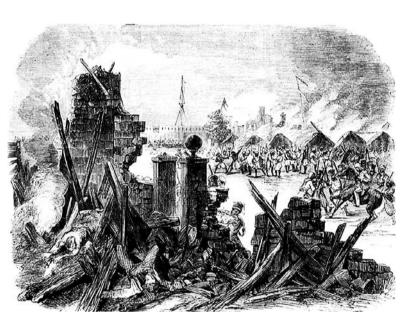

British measures to put an end to this rebellion were not slow in coming. And these measures displayed unparalleled ferocity and vengeance. By the beginning of June 1857, the Delhi, Meerut, Rohilkhand, Agra, Allahabad and Benares divisions had been placed under martial law. By a series of Acts passed in May and June, the definition of martial law was enlarged. These various Acts gave Britons the power to judge and take the life of Indians without recourse to the due process of law. All restrictions on the use of power

One officer wrote to The Times, "We have the power of life and death in our hands, and I assure you we spare not. A very summary trial is all that takes place." British rule in North India had come perilously close to being destroyed and the British had no other instrument at their command except the deployment of terror on a grand scale to restore their dominance. Imperial rule could only be maintained and reproduced by a show of terror and force. The fiction of civilising the Indians dissolved in the reality of the violence. Any form of rebellion, from stealing to desertion and possessing money that could not be accounted for, was punished by death. Colonel James Neill, who was one of the commanding officers of the troops that moved up the Gangetic plain to quell the uprising, gave the following orders to settle' the town and the country around Allahabad. "All the men nhabiting them (certain named vilages) were to be slaughtered." "All sepoys of mutinous regiments, not giving a good account of themselves, were to be hanged."

The 1857 Mutiny Advent Of Brutality

'The town of Futtehpore, which had revolted, was to be attacked, and the Pathan quarters destroyed with all their inhabitants. All heads insurgents, particularly at Futtehpore, to be hanged." "If the Deputy Collector is taken, hang him and have his head cut off and stuck up on one of the principal (Mahomedan) buildings of the town." William Howard Russell, the correspondent of the London Times, who was in India in 1858. met an officer who was a part of the column that, under Neill's orders. marched from Allahabad to Kanpur The officer reported that 'in two days, 42 men were hanged on the roadside, and a batch of 12 men was executed because their faces were turned the wrong way when they were met on the march.' Even boys who had playfully flaunted rebel colours and beaten a tom-tom were not spared. Every Indian who appeared in sight was shot or hung on the trees that lined the road, and villages were burnt.

Tyranny thus confronted rebellion. The government was unofficially warned about the policy of burning villages. It would make cultivation impossible, a famine inevitable and land revenue scarce. But there was a purpose in these acts of arson. A village is an integral part of a peasant's self-identity, his sense of belonging, a place where he is not a stranger. It is thus the primary location of a shared solidarity. The burning of the villages, homesteads, human shelters, barns, crops and so on, was aimed to interrupt the solidarity and cycle of agriculture that was the pivot of that form of life. A village is also the site of stories, myths and histories. By burning it, the British sought to obliterate the memory of a culture. Reflecting on these counter insurgency measures, J W Kaye,

The massacre at Satichaura ghat was a Public Execution affair, watched by who in the late 1860s and 1870s penned a magisterial history of what he called the 'sepoy war,' and was not known to be sympathetic to the rebels, wrote, "Over the whole of the Sepoy War, there is no darker cloud than that which gathered over Allahabad in this terrible summer. It is on the records of our British Parliament, in papers sent nome by the Governor-General of India in Council, that the 'aged, women and children are sacrificed as well as those guilty of rebellion. They were not deliberately hanged. but burnt to death in their villages." "Englishmen did not hesitate to boast, or to record their boastings in writing, that they had spared no one' and that 'peppering away at niggers' was very pleasant pastime." It was not as if the violence was carried out by men who were 'out there,' but it was known to the highest authorities and had their consent. Violence in 1857 acquired a different level of intensity by what happened in Kanpur in the end of June, and then again, at the end of July. The mutiny began in Kanpur on June 4. But since the outbreak at Meerut, the commander of the Kanpur division, Hugh Wheeler, had made preparations for the safety of the Europeans. He had fortified and stocked with food a set of barracks, and here, he moved the 900 Europeans of Kanpur. The fortified area came to be known as the entrenchment.' Here, the British remained from June 4 to June 27 surrounded on all sides by the rebels and fired upon night and day. But the British withstood the siege and this became a chapter in the nistory of British heroism and suffering. On June 25, the British pickets, through an intermediary received an offer of safe passage to Allahabad by river on boats and the men to be allowed 60 rounds of ammunition each. On the morning of June 27, around 450 Britons came out of the entrenchment to proceed to Satichaura Ghat where the boats were kept. As the British had nearly finished boarding the boats, the boatmen set fire to the thatched awnings of the boats and guns opened fire from both the banks of the Ganges, and finally, the cavalry vent in to slash and kill those who nad survived the shooting. All but 130 were slaughtered, 20 of the survivors managed to escape and the rest were taken prisoners. It would appear from all available evidence that the massacre at Satichaura Ghat had been planned in advance! The guns and troops were strategically placed, the rebels took up their positions at night, and orders were given to the neighbouring villagers to be present at the ghat. And they were present, according to one witness, 'with swords, spears and battle axes.'

The two boats that got away were chased and shot down. The boatmen set fire to the thatched awnings at a signal and the guns opened fire at the sound of a bugle. The cavalry went into the water to slash the survivors on very definite orders from Tantia Tope and the operations were supervised by Teeka Singh, Jwala Prasad (a close associate of Nana Sahib), a cavalry trooper called Nukkee and Tope, all of whom sat on a specially erected platform. The massacre took the nature of an execution. An open and public affair watched by 10,000 to 12,000 people. It was an expression of the collective hatred of the firangi. The massacre at Satichaura Ghat came close on the heels of Neill's counter-insurgency measures. It is not unfair to conjecture that the news of British atrocities had reached the rebels in Kanpur and the massacre was their revenge for it.

The Heroes of 1857

The narrative of the violence in Kanpur does not end here. The male were all shot. The women and children were kept as prisoners in a room known as Bibighur. When the news reached Kanpur that the British forces were very close to entering the town, orders were given on July 15 to kill the prisoners sepoys had refused to kill them, and they cut up the prisoners with swords and long knives. The bodies, it was said that not all of them were dead, were thrown into a well. When the British troops under Neill's command entered Kanpur, they pieced together what had happened at Satichaura Ghat and Bibighur. They were all driven by the 'fierce thirst for revenge' Neill spelt out what he wanted to achieve. "My object is to inflict a fearful pun shment for a revolting, cowardly barbarous deed and to strike terror into these rebels. Neill went on to describe the method through which to instill terror, "Whenever a rebel is caught, he s immediately tried, and unless, he can prove a defence, he is sentenced to be hanged at once, but the chief rebels or ringleaders I first make, clean up a portion of the pool of blood." "To touch blood is most abhorrent to the high caste natives They think by doing so they doom their souls to perdition. Let them think so."

Neill went a step further after the 'accused' had been hung. He instructed that 'all the Brahmins will be buried and all the Mahomedans burned.' Punishment followed in the after-life. As i

The British women and children who survived the Satichaura ghat massacre, the male survivers were all killed, were kept in a room known as Bibighar always is with victors, the British believed they had been the victims and they had been on the side of angels. Thus, they commemorated the well near Bibighur as a shrine. A weeping angel carved in marble Marochetti was placed over the well and on the stone was the simple epitaph: "These are they who have come out of great tribulation. The shrine was made into the exclusive preserve of the White man. No Indians, except Christians, were allowed near the well till August 15,

General Hugh Wheeler's fortified 'entrenchment' in Kanpur.

On that day, the crowd rushed in and popular enthusiasm could not be contained. The crowd damaged the nose of the angel. Following this, the decision was taken to remove the angel and the memorial and to re-erect in the memorial church in Wheeler's entrenchment

A bronze statue of Tantia Tope was erected overlooking the well Only with this reversal of icons could it be said that the cycle of violence, that was initiated on May 10. 1857, had come to a closure. The clo sure is so final and the replacement of British heroes by Indian 'freedom fighters' is so complete that observed, a curtain is drawn upon the massacres in Kanpur carried out by the rebels.

Nowhere is this more evident than in Jawaharlal Nehru's The Discovery of India, where he had this single sentence on rebel violence: "The rebel Indians sometimes indulged in cruel and barbarous behaviour. They were often angered by reports of British is telling. In the centenary year, the Government of India produced a volume on 1857 written by the famous historian S. N. Sen. The project had been sponsored by the then education minister, Abul Kalam Azad, who had advised Sen to produce an 'objective' history of the uprising. Sen had very little to say about rebel violence and tried to free Nana Sahib from any responsibility for the massacre which, he said, was the work of the sepovs. A freedom fighter like Nana

The use of the word 'sometimes

Sahib, with his assigned place in India's Book of Martyrs, could hardly have his hand tainted by blood. There remains a persistent refusal to recognise rebel violence and its spectacular scale as dis played in the massacres in Kanpur. In the absence of that recognition any attempt to observe the anniversary will be incomplete and all attempts to appropriate the uprising into the annals of the Indian national struggle will be raught with tension. There is one other aspect that needs to be borne in mind in the present conjuncture. This relates to the ethical issues relating to violence. In a world living under the shadow of terrorist violence and the violence concentrated in the hands of some, it is worth reflecting on the use of violence and its cele bration as a part of a nation's struggle for freedom.

Mahatma Gandhi's message of non-violence may not be as irrelevant as is often made out to be, in the pursuit to be a great power.

rajeshsharma1049@gmail.com

British soldiers looting Qaisar Bagh, Lucknow.

THE WALL

BABY BLUES

ZITS

By Jerry Scott & Jim Borgman